The National Lottery Community Fund commissioned a poll to look at people’s attitudes towards their communities during the pandemic.

The research was run by the independent research firm Opinium, with fieldwork conducted between 27th November and 8th December.

In total, 7009 people were polled from across the UK, including boosted samples of 496 in Wales, 779 in Scotland, and 603 in Northern Ireland.

About the project
Looking back over 2020

How have attitudes to community changed over the course of a pandemic?
Five key findings

01 A majority think that a crisis brings out the best in people. This is particularly strongly held among older people.

02 One in three say that this year has made them feel more a part of a local community.

03 Four in ten have used green spaces in their local area more this year than they usually would.

04 Biggest benefits of being part of a community have been “Being able to give others support” and “Having people close by to help if needed”.

05 Being a part of a community has made people feel like “we’re all in this together”.

Looking back over 2020
People think a national crisis usually brings out the best in people

A majority (53%) of people say that a crisis usually brings out the best in people, compared to around half that number (27%) who think it brings out the worst. There is a big age divide with older people being more likely to think it brings out the best in people.

Does a national crisis…?

A majority (53%) of people say that a crisis usually brings out the best in people, compared to around half that number (27%) who think it brings out the worst. There is a big age divide with older people being more likely to think it brings out the best in people.

Full question wording: “Do you think a national crisis, such as the coronavirus, generally brings out the best or the worst in people in the UK?”. Sample: 7009 UK Adults. Fieldwork: 27th November – 8th December 2020.
A third of people say it has become more important to be part of their local community

Over six in ten (62%) say that it is either very or fairly important to feel part of their local community, compared to 33% who say it is not very important or not important at all. Parents (65%) are even more likely than non-parents (55%) to say that community is important.

A third (33%) say that Coronavirus has made it more important to be part of a community, while 35% say it has made them feel more a part of theirs. In both cases just under half (47%/45%) say it has made little difference either way.

Full question wording: “How important, if at all, is it to you that you feel part of your local community?”; “And to what extent, if at all, has the impact of coronavirus changed this?”.

Four in ten have been using green space more this year

Those in work (43%) have also been more likely to have increased their use of green spaces than those out of work (35%).

Importance of feeling part of a local community…?

Full question wording: “Have you used green spaces in your local area more or less during the coronavirus outbreak than you did before?”.

Giving support and having people close by are the key benefits of a local community

When asked what the key benefits of being part of the community this year have been, the top answers are “Being able to give others support” (37%) and “having people close by to help if needed” (35%). Those aged over 65 (47%) are more likely than those aged under 35 (27%) to think the latter option is a benefit.

What are the key benefits of being part of a local community?

- Being able to give others support: 37%
- Having people close by to help if needed: 35%
- Gave me a sense of connection with others: 34%
- Reduced the sense of isolation: 32%
- Encouraged me to get out of the house for fresh air: 31%
- Cheered me up: 23%
- Receiving support from others: 23%
- Reassured me: 18%

Full question wording: “What do you think have been the key benefits of being part of a local community this year during the coronavirus outbreak? Please tick all that apply.” Sample: 4829 UK Adults who feel part of a local community. Fieldwork: 27th November – 8th December 2020.
Being a part of a community has made people feel like “we’re all in this together”

Being part of a community this year has clearly given people a sense of togetherness. Over four in ten (41%) of those who feel part of a community say it has made them feel like “We’re all in this together”. This is even higher among women (45%) than men (36%).

How has being part of a community made you feel?

- Sense we’re all in this together: 41%
- Less lonely and isolated: 23%
- More supported: 22%
- Happier: 21%
- Gives me a sense of purpose: 19%
- Less stressed: 18%

Looking forward to 2021

What do people want from their communities as we come out of this pandemic?
Five key findings

01 People think the pandemic will have positive long term impacts on community spirit in the UK

02 Three in ten want to be more involved in their local community in 2021

03 Reducing loneliness and helping the economy are seen as being the most important factors for community wellbeing next year

04 When it comes to place and space, safety and access to green space are the key concerns for the year ahead

05 People think they will start to enjoy the simple pleasures in life more as we move on from the pandemic
Despite a tough year, people think there might be some long term benefits to the pandemic.

After a difficult year the public are clearly trying to look for the positives as well. In the long run, nearly half of people think this year will have a positive impact on community spirit in the UK (48%), the amount people care about others (46%), and the amount people care about the environment (40%).

What impact will the pandemic have on the following in the long run?

- Community spirit in the UK: 48% Change for the better, 13% Change for the worse, 31% No difference either way.
- The amount people in the UK care about others: 46% Change for the better, 14% Change for the worse, 31% No difference either way.
- The amount people in the UK care about the environment: 40% Change for the better, 13% Change for the worse, 38% No difference either way.

Full question wording: “In the long run, do you think the pandemic will change each of the following for the better or for the worse, or has it made no difference either way?” Sample: 7009 UK Adults. Fieldwork: 27th November – 8th December 2020.
Three in ten want to get involved in their local community in the coming year

While 32% currently say they are involved in their local community, a further three in ten (30%) say they want to get more involved next year. This is higher among the very youngest (41% of those aged under 34) who are already the most likely to say they are currently involved (41% say they are).

Four in ten think they will now start to enjoy the simple pleasures in life more

After a year that has had such a dramatic impact on people’s lives it is inevitable that some will look to change their behaviour in the future. The main ways people will be looking to do so id “enjoying the simple pleasures in life more” (40%) and “spending more time with family and friends” (33%).

Full question wording: “Do you think that coronavirus will change your behaviour in any of the following ways? Please tick all that apply..". Sample: 7009 UK Adults. Fieldwork: 27th November – 8th December 2020.
The importance of local community groups

How have local groups, projects, charities, and volunteering helped people during the pandemic?
Three quarters think local groups help strengthen their community

Three quarters of people (75%) say they think that local groups are important to their local community, compared to just 14% who think they are not important. Large majorities also agree that these groups deserve more recognition (65%) and have helped and supported during the pandemic (56%).

Full question wording: “For the following question, we talk about local community groups and projects, volunteers and charities. By this we mean a group of people or an organisation that works for the benefit of the public, such as a food bank, a community garden or a befriending project. How important, if at all do you think local community groups and projects, volunteers and charities are in strengthening your local community?”;
Older people think groups are more important but younger people want to hear more

Older people are much more likely to think they are important to the local community. Over eight in ten (81%) of over 65s think they are, compared to 68% of those under 34. However those in younger age group (53%) are more likely than those in the older age group (38%) to want more information.
